I need to build something that allows a user to create custom quests. The player types in the quest name and the goal he wants to accomplish and then presses a button. The program dynamically adds a button to the bottom of the form, and then calls a function to populate the button with data from the form. There will be hundreds of quests and some will be repeatable, so the form will have the same layout, but the number of buttons will vary. Since this is a school project, I can't require the player to type in any data on the form, since that wouldn't make the quest a simple thing to create. I know the best solution would be to add something like a field, that allows the player to type in the data he wants to add to the quest. But that's not what I'm looking for now. I want to know the most efficient way to add a button at runtime to the form based on a user-generated string. Thanks, -Brad A: You could use the FindControl Method of a Form to search for any control on the form and then do something to it. Examples include thin-sectioning techniques for producing well-preserved samples for detailed study, conventional electron microscopy, and electron microscopy of frozen-dried and freeze-substituted tissues. The use of electron microscopy to examine tissues is demonstrated with emphasis on observation of tissue-specific structures as well as the technique of correlative light and electron microscopy

A novel three-step synthesis strategy was developed for the preparation of nanostructured Pd/carbon catalyst, in which the second shell of Pd/C-Pd/C@Na₂S₃ nanospheres and the first shell of carbon materials were used as the novel epoxy-coupling catalyst and the carrier, respectively. The formed Pd/carbon catalyst was characterized by the characterization of X-ray diffraction (XRD), X- f988f36e3a
