Transposition of the great vessels in infants and children. In this paper we summarize the surgical results of our group of 13 patients between October 1985 and October 1989, in whom transposition of the great vessels was corrected, the majority of the cases with the Ross procedure. The risk of death after surgery was 0% and the rate of reoperation was 28%. The most frequent complications were atrial arrhythmias (23%), cyanosis (23%) and right ventricular insufficiency (15%). In five cases we had to carry out a pulmonary homograft patch due to the inadequate size of the pulmonary homograft. This experience is a basis for future studies in which a mean follow-up is between 3 and 6 years. Recently, as a method of producing styrenic resins, such as ABS resins, polycarbonate resins, and polystyrene resins, there is known a continuous production method by which an extruder is used, a resin material is continuously supplied therein, and the material is continuously converted into a desired shape to produce the resins. The continuous production method is a method of continuously producing the resins at a high yield at a low cost. However, when polystyrene is produced using a continuous production apparatus, styrene monomer present in a polymerization reaction does not always react uniformly with a monomer-reducing agent, but is present in a polymerized polymer in a low concentration. The degree of polymerization of the polymerized
